

with the results in the latter areas yet to be evaluated. Under the Philadelphia prototype plan, if an action involves less than $10,000 damages, it is automatically placed on an arbitration list, composed of more than 40% of the lawyers in that City. Forty days after a certificate of readiness is filed, the case is then assigned to a panel of three arbitrators, although any qualifying case may be so assigned by an "agreement of reference" signed by all parties, even though no lawsuit has actually been filed. The panel hearing the case is paid a fixed fee from the county treasury. Either party may request a trial de novo within a fixed period following the award. However, the appellant is required to pay the total amount of the arbitrators' charges, which amount is nonrecoverable. The Philadelphia procedure has been reported to be favorably accepted by all segments of the Bar, and to be efficient and economical. A subcommittee of this Committee, headed by Judge Paul E. Vardeman, of the Jackson County Circuit Court, has been actively investigating the possibility of a pilot project for court annexed arbitration on a purely voluntary basis. It is too early at this time to even attempt to evaluate such a proposal. We do hope, however, that it will be capable of implementation, and urge the successors of this Committee to continue efforts to implement and report the progress of such a pilot project. We believe it may have a substantial effect upon the economical aspects of litigation in our court system.
